

In this world there has only been one perfect person and that person was Jesus. To expect school crime to decrease people would have to take steps they are unwilling to take to stop it. Three major things that need help are family issues, anger management in teens, and gang and club violence.

Teen family issues are a horrible problem in schools and families right now. Teens do not wish to be parented and believe they can make it on their own. So when a parent does try to correct them they “fly off the handle” and become out of control, not only with their families but their classmates as well.

In order for classroom or school violence to stop teens need to learn to control anger and “hate” toward peers. Every person has someone he or she cannot stand but every person does not lash out and attack those people. Maybe a step to help that would be school wide counseling or just “talking it out”. Adults cannot expect teens to like everyone. A lot of the time violence spans from race, religion, worth, and self esteem. These people band together to make what we know today as gangs.

To make my point on gangs, we need to look at the movies teens and children watch everyday. Street and club violence is also very prominent in the video game setting. No matter how hard people try, gangs will never be stomped, just pushed out of the way to make a good reputation. The actual problem is never solved.

Every person has problems and issues; and every person has to learn to control them. Stopping school violence is a great goal, but people need to step through the right hoops and start from the root of the problem. Get personal with the families, figure out ways to help manage their anger and dispense gangs to the best of their ability. Save the teen’s lives and take a stand!
